The basic design of the mammalian forelimb demonstrates the evolutionary phenomenon of adaptive radiation. Through natural selection, the form of mammalian forelimbs has been modified during the last 65 million years into many shapes to per-form a variety of functions. By adapting to forest, plains, air, water, and underground, mammals have

ADAPTIVE RADIATION: MAMMALIAN FORELIMBS

The forelimbs of the mammals were originally similar but have evolved into different morphologies with different functions. Adaptive radiation occurs when a species or few closely related species enter an area and rapidly evolve to fill many different environments. The finch species in Galapagos Archipelago is a good example of adaptive radiation.

Suppose someone came up with a new method of taxonomy: animals would be classified by functional niche, not morphological patterns that show relatedness. This person's tangled logic is as follows: since form and function are linked, and form is heritable, function must be heritable too. Use the concepts of evolutionary convergence and adaptive radiation to straighten this person out.
